Getting the information off of cemetery headstones is a form of historical and genealogical research which is generally confined to the east coast of the United States. In that area there are a generous sprinkling of properly ruinous cemeteries with properly moss covered headstones to keep a number of copiests busy for yet some time to come. In other sections of the country people are wont to smile somewhat tolerantly at this rather peculiar form of research. They little realize that cemeteries in their own midst are rapidly falling into decay and thereby are carrying into oblivion facts about former citizens which are either hard to come by elsewhere or in some cases are irreplaceable.

Such is the case in Lake Charles. In 1910 the Calcasieu Parish courthouse burned and with it most of the parish records to that time, including birth and death records. Cemetery headstones, then, constitute the only public record of the births and deaths of many early Lake Charles residents, a record which is itself gradually being destroyed. In the Lake Charles of 1910 there were at least four burying grounds, of which only one, St. Patrick's, is any longer consistently used and properly maintained. Open spaces in the remaining three are mowed occasionally and some family plots maintained, but they are otherwise neglected. A jungle of weeds and brush has grown over many graves, making it nearly impossible to find them, while a number of the tombs above ground have crumbled into heaps of brick and vines. A large number of the stones are broken and scattered and in many cases have been lost altogether, either carried off by vandals or buried in the general debris. Others have weathered so that they are now illegible. At the Church Street Cemetery several large trees blown down by the hurricane of 1957 have but added to the ruin.

In view of these facts it was felt that some record should be made of the information that remained on the headstones in these four cemeteries. Accordingly in the summer of 1957 the present list was compiled and as far as their present state of decay will permit is complete for all four cemeteries. It contains the names of 595 persons together with such birth and death dates as could be found or deciphered. It also contains the place of birth or death as well as records of military service and membership in fraternal orders where these were available. The latter, it was felt, would provide further biographical information and might also prove to be valuable leads for interested persons. It should be noted that where the compiler was unsure of his transcription, due either to a broken or weathered stone, that fact is noted in the list by a question mark in parentheses immediately following the particular item questioned.

As to the cemeteries themselves, none of them have a name known to the compiler. Therefore each has been given a name in the present list according to its location. The oldest of the four is herein called St. Patrick's, lying as it does just west of St. Patrick's Hospital. The oldest tomb found in the city is that of Samuel Adams Kirby, a boy of ten, who was buried here in 1847. Here also are found the graves of many members of the Sallier family as well as the graves of many of the French families of Lake Charles. It early became a favorite burying ground of many of the French people and has remained so to the present. Though it is well cared for, there are an unusually large number of graves for which there are now no markers, including perhaps the grave of Charles Sallier for whom the town and lake were named, for several graves are unmarked or their stones undecipherable in the Sallier plot.

The name Lake Front has been given to the cemetery which lies in the bend of Highway 90 on the northeast shore of Lake Charles. Though the cemetery is quite small it contains the graves of some of the most important families in the early history of the city. James Ryan, who led in the movement to make the city the parish seat and for whom the main street is named, is buried here with other members of his family. Some of the Bilbos, whose home and lumber concern once stood nearby, are also interred here as are members of the Pujo and Hodges families.

By far the largest of the four is the cemetery which lies at the southeast corner of Common and Iris streets, in this compilation called the Common Street Cemetery. While some of the well known families of the city used this cemetery for a time, especially the Rosteets, the Landrys, and the Pujos, it is chiefly notable as a burying ground for the immigrant families of the city at the turn of the century. For once Italian and not French is to be found on some of the older headstones, and a number state that the person was born outside the United States.

The name Church Street has been given to the newest of the four, the cemetery at the southwest corner of Church and Moss streets. Lying in a lovely grove of large, old trees and bounded on the east by a fine row of magnolias, it is the most distinctly Protestant of the four cemeteries, and the least French as well. Three Protestant ministers from the last century are buried here, and such names as Brodersen and Vordenbaumen are to be found among its headstones, strange names indeed for south Louisiana. In fact, inscriptions can be found in both Swedish and German while French inscriptions are notably absent.

It is possible that in addition to these grounds one or two Negro cemeteries exist in Lake Charles which antedate 1910 as well as a family plot or two. Further investigation could discover if this were in fact the case. Whether these exist in old Lake Charles or not, however, there are a number of old burial grounds in the present confines of the city and in the parish. One of the most important of these is the Goos family cemetery, still in use, which lies at the end of Shattuck Street in old Goosport. Here lie members of the Goos, Fitzenreiter, Moeling, and Paret families, and in the tangle of undergrowth outside the Goos ground proper are other tombs which date at least to the early part of the present century. In the western part of the parish one would expect to find at least one or two cemeteries predating by a number of years anything to be found in Lake Charles. For one thing, while their existence was an unsettled one, a number of people lived in that area in the Arroyo Hondo days and may have established burial grounds. For another the old Antioch Church, now the Baptist church at Edgerly and one of the oldest Protestant churches in the state, was established in 1820 and probably had a burying ground near its original site. Information from such grounds as these would be especially valuable both genealogically and historically.

This compilation, then, should be considered but a beginning. Many cemeteries exist in the bounds of old imperial Calcasieu Parish which were established before the courthouse fire of 1910. Each contains information lost from all other public record. It would seem, therefore, both wise and profitable if some person or group would make a systematic search for these grounds and would institute and bring to completion a compilation of information from them before ruin and decay do further damage. It is hoped that the present list will stimulate such a project.
